Skitch has a free version, but to use the pro version we have to apply for an account, and this is done from the play store. This means we have to click through various terms and conditions, before being given a valid apple account to use Skitch. This won't bother most people, but for lots of people this isn't a great way to use the app. As Apple's rules around cloud based apps has tightened, Skitch has started to face difficulties in entering the App store and it has been rejected by apple due to the fact it requires a sub account to work. If you like Skitch, or really like the fact that you can use it without an account, you can sign up for a guest account here. The percentage of correct responses was lower in the second than in the first test, suggesting that reading or writing the sentences left-hemisphere dominant in these tasks. Experiment 2 revealed that the above results were not due to differences in two task-specific variables: the number of words per sentence and the degree of difficulty (quantitative vs. qualitative).
