The President has ordered the State Department to begin work to admit the so-called "low-risk" refugees, which include orphans and women with children. Earnest said it is now a matter of "administrative coordination" before the administration can begin formally accepting the refugees. He stressed the President's belief that the U.S. is "a country that does a good job of prioritizing people who are most in need of protection. That is the primary factor the President has considered in this decision-making process." The administration has been under fire from Republicans, including presidential candidate Ted Cruz, who has criticized the plan as an "indiscriminate mass of people." "We don't have a vetting program in place that ensures that we can prevent terrorists from entering the United States," he said during Thursday's GOP debate. "The vetting that you're talking about is not a method that we've used in the past and is something that has never been used in the past to screen people to ensure that they're not terrorists. "We know the objective of this administration is to bring over a number of terrorists into the United States," he said. "As we bring in tens of thousands of refugees, it's going to dramatically increase the likelihood of them bringing over thousands of terrorists with them." - Updated at 12:11 p.m.Q: What is the Rails equivalent of J2EE's EJBs?
