Shajra Nasab Of Hazrat Muhammad In Urdu Pdf 171 Direct Costs and Intra-operative Monitoring Routine monitoring should be used in several cases, where the accuracy of the measurement is important and where the measurement has a significant impact on the treatment. Examples are the intra-operative glucose monitoring for patients that need insulin therapy to avoid brain damage, and the monitoring of blood pressure values during cerebral aneurysm surgery. The most obvious drawback of routine monitoring is the extra costs related to the use of the devices. The actual cost for equipment, installation and maintenance may vary significantly. The indication for routine monitoring can only be given after a careful analysis of the benefits and costs. The equipment The choice of the equipment is a major factor. Clinical data for different available devices are available in the product data sheets. Based on these data, one can make a rough estimate of the costs involved in maintaining one extra device. The device should be a digital monitor that is fully integrated in the (Intra-operative Management Systems) IOMS of the hospitals. Clinical databases can be established and entered directly into the IOMS. The setting up of this relation for other monitoring systems is time consuming and tedious. The monitoring procedure The continuous monitoring of the patients, usually necessary for the operative procedures, can be continued uninterruptedly. For this reason, an operative procedure is considered a data source. The continuous monitoring, normally starting with the pre-operative evaluation of the patient (before anesthesia), is continued and validated in the different phases of the procedure. The intra-operative evaluation of the patient's well being, monitored as a continuous process, leads to specific actions being taken, when necessary. These actions include dosage changes of medication, additional monitoring by sensors, and other actions. These actions lead to a lower complication rate. The time saved by using continuous monitoring of the patients is enormous. The equipment types Different types of monitoring equipment are available: Continuous monitoring of the heart rate, mean arterial pressure, capillary blood pressure, electrocardiogram and oxygen saturation Continuous measurement of body temperature Continuous measurement of body parameters Continuous measurement of body fluids (urine
