With the help of the gorgeous graphics, outstanding gameplay and epic music, the Legend of Zelda: Skyward Sword will keep you immersed in the adventure for hours on end. DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. -- NASCAR has little patience for uncertainty. But there is a sense of uncertainty that permeates through the organization as the 2020 season creeps closer. It may be the overriding theme of the first two days of the Daytona 500, complete with the fact no one will know who will be in the field until late next month. NASCAR is still assessing how to handle the coronavirus pandemic and what safety precautions to take for in-person events. Monster Energy NASCAR Cup Series teams arrived at Daytona International Speedway on Sunday for practice, having arrived in the states 24 hours prior. In the Monster Energy Series, drivers were met at the airport by representatives of the teams to gather in the hospitality suite. The team houses are still closed. But racing on track this week is a reality. Most teams won't know who will race until the final two races are completed. It could be three weeks before every driver on the roster is known to the public. It is pure madness, but there is little choice. With the consequences of the virus still unknown, no one knows what it will be like. "I think it's the new normal," Matt DiBenedetto, the chief of NASCAR's safety and security, said. "It's going to be a completely new normal, I think, for the next year, and it just goes back to we're making decisions that we're going to make today -- in a couple of weeks, three weeks from now -- with limited information. "We're dealing with this issue and we're dealing with it quickly. We have staff doing it, our front office is doing it. We understand that for the foreseeable future, we're going to operate the way we normally operate, but we're going to have to have, on a daily basis, a gut check and a mental check and a huge check of those things." It's not just Daytona. NASCAR is planning to have a two-day test at Charlotte Motor Speedway on Monday and Tuesday. The No. 1 of the series, Kyle Busch, is scheduled to race that track, scheduled to be the third race of the season. While Busch is 6d1f23a050
