Is there a way to convert from.mp4 to.mp3 (video to audio)?[17:06].President Donald Trump and his top economic adviser insist the U.S. economy is strong and the stock market is an excellent indicator of that strength. But the U.S. economy is sputtering, unemployment is rising and the Dow Jones industrial average dropped 788 points in May. Democrats are set to take over the House of Representatives in the fall and say they will launch a series of investigations into Trump's business dealings and finances, most notably his tax returns. Even more worrisome for the president: Democrats are expected to start looking at Trump's relationships with foreign governments, including Russian President Vladimir Putin. The revelations could be politically devastating for Trump, who has vowed to step up his trade war with China and is negotiating with Kim Jong Un for his country to denuclearize. "The relationship with Kim is extremely important," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi told The Washington Post. "That is a lot of leverage." Here's a look at some of the highlights from the turbulent first 100 days of Trump's presidency. 1. The economy is sputtering If Trump and his economic adviser, Larry Kudlow, are correct, then the U.S. economy is roaring. After all, Trump promised to unleash a "rocket ship" of growth, and the stock market is up 10 percent since the president's election. Unemployment, meanwhile, is at a 17-year low. But the data are not encouraging. May was a tough month for the U.S. economy, with the economy adding just 88,000 jobs, below the 200,000 economists had forecast. And the U.S. unemployment rate, at 3.7 percent, is only near the lowest level in more than half a century, as many Americans continue to leave the labor market. "The conventional wisdom is that the economy is strong, and I believe that's true," said
